IMPRESSIONS OF THE HOUSTON CONVENTION
(By N. R. Price)

The gathering of the Democratic Clubs at Houston, to nominate candidates for the Presidency and vice-president, is over; also the platform committee labored violently and brought forth a Bill of Rights of sorts. "Far flung the armies melt away; the Captains and the Kings depart." Before the delegates got started on the homeward road, Governor Smith in a telegram to the convention states his position and reiterates his views on Modification and state rights, which are well known, and in no wise changed by the recent event. The act of a resourceful and courageous leader and a master of political strategy. The Republican party and the party nominee are forced to take definite position, under fire of aggressive Democracy. Then, "He who dallies is a dastard, he who doubts is damned." The forty-eight states, the territories and insular possessions, Porto Rico, Hawaii, Philippines, Alaska, and the Virgin Islands sent representatives to a remote and non-central city situated in a sub-tropical climate in mid-summer, where the mean summer temperature hangs around 82 and very humid. Delegates, Alternates, plain visitors and camp followers assembled to the number of several thousand. The convention hall was calculated to hold 20,000, and was filled at every session, and the hum of massed humanity was like that of bees in a hive. The city of Houston did not fail in any particular to entertain, and deserves commendation for large hospitality.

During the sessions, some of which lasted six hours, none were observed to go to sleep or be bored while sitting on hard benches, presumably to listen to platitudinous speeches droned out from notes by politicians who were, for the most part, too much impressed by the importance of themselves and their messages to be of any importance whatever. A speaker who might be a stranger to four-fifths of his audience, including the far-flung radio lines, would consume his entire thirty minutes nominating for the Presidency a chief of some Utah tribe, whose very name was unknown to the aforesaid audience. Notable exceptions were the opening speech of Mr. C. Bowers, which was able in fact and delivery. Also the fighting address of Governor Ritchie of Maryland on his favorite topic, States Rights. The Dissatisfied Dry of Georgia, Oklahoma, and other points South, had got the Governor aroused by attempting to howl him down, and he responded with one of the most incisive speeches of the convention, being also one of the shortest. The blind Senator Gore of Oklahoma held the audience with a speech in which was the saving salt of humor, and lastly the stern-faced Senator Reed thundered for an hour and a half with his clarion call to battle. For the most part the speakers read their pieces from voluminous rolls of folio paper, while the audience amused itself with the great spectacle of the convention itself, the music of the bands and conversations among themselves, though forced to hear every word of the speeches, because by modern perfection of the dictaphone ordinary speech is heard to the remotest part of the hall. The presence of so many fair and brilliant minded women certainly adds to the morale and esprit-de-corps of the average aged and hard-boiled politician veteran of many conventions, and few there be who do not make a brave attempt to strut their stuff.

Four sleeps and five days this writer remained in Houston while attending the great Convention Council as an alternate Delegate representing the Hill Tribes of the Sixth West Virginia. Thrice daily we assembled in the councils of the Brave, and also the Fair, killing time with many words, while the real work of the Convention is done in caucus of State delegations and deliberations of the platform Committee on the formulation of a national Bill of Human Rights. A great moment was when I grasped a banner and led the Section of West Virginia Alternate Delegates in a demonstration which spontaneously broke out as a protest against Religious Intolerance. Only five of the delegations present coldly refused to join in the march. Another tense moment was when we joined to prevent ill-advised partisans of Senator Reed, who wished to make the gesture. At the same moment fights broke out in the Kansas, Texas, Mississippi, and Tennessee sectors. A little roughhousing, broken standards, and high words, but the Sergeant at Arms and his cohorts were able to stop the uprising without blood shed and broken bones. It may well be that the savage breasts of the warriors, again demonstrating the value of ladies at political conventions, but as nearly as I could determine the ladies seemed to get more kick out of these eddying tumults than anybody else, and were usually delighted spectators on the side lines.

Among the special writers and famous literary men at the Convention was Henry L. Menchen, of Baltimore and New York, a master of invective and satire, just arrived from the Kansas City Convention, where, judging from the reports, he found little of promise in the works of that great republican body. His reaction to the antics of some of the more prominent bores of Houston is likely to be just as savagely dealt with. Mr. Menchen is a vigorous looking, heavy set man of not unattractive appearance, and appears younger than his more than forty years. From a few minutes conversation with the great man, who is better known and quoted in Europe than in America, we judged he was almost pleased with the progress of the Houston Convention. Too much so, in fact, to make his articles flame as they usually do with his denunciations of cant, hypocrisy, and plain bunk so much in evidence at National Conventions of every sort.

In spite of the certainty that existed in most minds that Smith would be nominated, there was in that great audience a suppressed feeling that surprises might attend the voting. Faith prevailed in the anti-Smith camp that the arm of the Lord would be revealed and the delegates stamped to one of the candidates more acceptable to their way of thinking. However, there was no supernatural action, and the Smith vote mounted up. By the time West Virginia, the last of the Smith States on the muster role, was reached, Smith was still short the necessary 733 votes. He had then nearly 650. In the primary of last May the vote of West Virginia helped very materially in holding the lines for Governor Smith, so in the convention the West Virginia vote seemed to be at a pivotal point. Immediately thereafter Ohio, Kansas, Mississippi, Tennessee were on the floor ready to swing to Smith, and it was done. There was on attempt made to make it unanimous, a dignified gesture in keeping with the high-toned manner of the campaign.

A word in praise of the Texas watermelon. It is a popular vegetable or fruit with native and visitor alike, and personally I inhaled more watermelon on this tour than in twenty years past, and found it wholesome and nourishing, a very staff of life. To satisfy the curiosity of those who are inclined to be bibulous, I will say, yes, there was liquor to be had in Houston, and it is safe to say that the lips of many Delegates touched it, and there was some complaint of the high cost of the bootleg wares. I never have determined what the poet Shelley was driving at when he remarked: "Oh for a beaker full of the Dry South; the true, the blissful Hypocrite." Figure it out for yourself.
